ERCSW Eighth research seminar

Insider's view as a starting point, the keystone to a change in dealings based on power in participative research in social work

Debates on empowerment

Fifth seminar of the cycle entitled:

“The participative approach in research on practices in the field of social work”

From December 2nd to December 3rd 2011
Vytautas Magnus University - Kaunas, Lithuania

Since 2000, the seminars set up by the ERCSW (European Resource Centre for Research on Social Work) are focusing on developing and debating epistemological and methodological aspects of research in social work. They are devoted to the study and understanding of practices in the field of social work, more specifically practices recently implemented to meet major challenges.

This eighth seminar shall take place on December 2nd and 3rd in Kaunas (Vytautas Magnus University), Lithuania. It will fall within the framework of the cycle of seminars set up by the ERCSW: “The participative approach in research on practices in the field of social work”.

The conclusions of the debates of the four previous ERCSW seminars focused on this theme have enabled us to stress the relevance of various aspects of research in social work. Seven points were particularly underlined:

- ◇ The significance of describing the area observed and the epistemological position adopted by professionals carrying out research;

- ◇ The relevance of a cross-disciplinary approach and of knowledge transfers, as opposed to the inadequacies of simple inter- and multidisciplinary approaches;
- ◇ The need to put together knowledge shared by researchers and professionals as well;
- ◇ The place of the participative approach and joint practices in research on practices and the kind of knowledge produced in social work;
- ◇ The significant role of discourse in participative research, in which involvement is understood as a creation of a common space shared by professionals and researchers alike;
- ◇ The sort of person the “third party/mediator” is, no longer understood as a person or an object playing the part of a mediator in certain situations, thus enabling to solve conflicts inherent to duality, but rather as conveying meaning for the related persons;
- ◇ The intermediate or interstitial epistemological posture situated between the strained poles represented by theory and practice, and its significance in the making up of research on practices in the field of social work.

During the seminar in Kaunas we shall resume the debates, focusing more specifically on the issue of power in the participative approach in research in social work. Our starting point shall be what happens to the different persons in their everyday life and particularly how they consider their situation.

Starting from the insider’s view presupposes that the researcher adopts an epistemological posture which will serve as a guideline for designing the research process. Besides, one may agree that the purpose of social work is to emancipate persons, and empowerment seems to bring about such an emancipation.

During this seminar, we would like to explore three avenues of research:

1) The first one deals with the form(s) of social change when the chosen research processes and purposes prompt an evolution in social practices.

Two types of questions could be examined:

- ✓ The ambiguity of participative research when it comes to its unthought-of aspects with on one hand a reasoning based on dialogue, reflexivity and evolution, and on the other hand asymmetrical relations inducing connections based on power, often unheeded, but giving way to clashes.
- ✓ The analysis of the meaning and significance of the essentials of a process in participative research concerning on one hand a subject in a specific situation, and on the other hand the evolutions in the social context, social services, political speeches and State policies.

2) The second one deals with the research reasoning, starting from the point of view of persons, which reveals their vulnerability and private lives, and thus shall be supported by subjective experience, understood as an area to create knowledge.

Two types of questions could then be suggested:

- ✓ What is the part played by the researcher in this structure created by dealings between subjects and its methodological inferences?
- ✓ How do we identify, for each person participating in the research, the dilemmas within the processes of knowledge emergence and self transformation?

3) The third avenue which has been our guideline since these seminars began, deals with the theories and methodologies called up by the researchers concerning empowerment and the implied epistemological postures.

This call is aimed at:

- ◇ Researchers in the field of social work and Ph.D. students interested in the problematic of this seminar,
- ◇ Professionals from the field of social work, interested and involved in participative research on social work practice,
- ◇ All members of the ERCSW association and all those who took part in previous seminars.

Languages used at the seminar: French, English.

Abstracts are expected on October 20th 2011 at the latest.

Papers must be handed in electronic form, in the language used to read it, as well as the five key-words in French and English to the following address: certs.secretariat@etsup.com

A publication in the Lithuanian review “SOCIAL WORK. METHODS & EXPERIENCES” will put together a selection of papers. These texts shall be handed during the seminar or within 30 days afterwards.
